Take your images, add some unique effects to bring out their best, export them as full-blown pixel art, and bring them to life. The human eye can only actually perceive about 7 shades of colors. A human being's color vision is approximated by shades of gray, where the exact number of gray shades can range from 10 to 80. Even though a human's color vision has many limitations, they can still see every color in the spectrum to some degree. The process of representing something in a series of pixels, where each pixel is a single color, is called Bitmapping. Although real objects, like our eyes, don't create images this way, we often see images created through Bitmapping, and they are called Pixel Art. Although pixel art became popular in the early 80's, its popularity has continued to grow in the 21st Century. The reason behind its growing appeal is that digital technology has advanced to the point where the art styles it can produce are becoming more realistic. In this day and age, we often take photos with our smartphones, and we rarely have the time to do editing on these images by hand. The job is carried out automatically through some sort of application on a computer. This is one of the reasons why there have been so many applications on the market designed to help people make pixel art. And among them, PixelOver offers the user a chance to create pixel art by merging an image with one that has been enhanced by the application, converting the image into a full-blown pixel art image. There are many effects that can be added to images in this program. The effects include magnification, colorize, blur, and dissolves, to name a few. It's a powerful tool that can easily alter the color and brightness of an image, making for great photos no matter what the original is. Using the Surface Effect It might seem strange to use a Surface Effect on a black and white photo, but that particular one is called the Floor Effect.
